How Canada Benefits from Canadian Pacific Financing

ONE reason why Canadian Pacific traffic charges are low is that its capital charges are low.

Surplus earnings have been reinvested for betterments and improvements without being capitalized.

Surpluses of $31 per share of all its common stock have gone back into the railway, a total of $80,600,000.

This was a contribution, without interest, by the shareholders, otherwise the Company would have been forced to borrow this amount, thus adding to its bonded debt and permanently increasing its capital charges.

In addition to this the shareholders have contributed as premiums on the purchase of shares the sum of $31,200,000, equal to $12 per share on the whole common stock, which has been similarly employed, and costs neither the Company nor the public one dollar in capital charges.

If other amounts similarly appropriated were added to the surpluses and premiums, an increase of not less than $240,000,000 might properly be made in the capital of the Company, the interest on which would form a permanent charge on the Company's traffic.

The Canadian public has profited by the Company's ex## penditure of $68,000,000 for immigration, settlement and irrigation projects.

Moreover, the Canadian Pacific is the largest individual taxpayer in Canada. Its contribution in taxes to the public treasury in a period of only five years (1919 to 1923, inclusive) being $31,666,000.

Thus the Canadian Pacific, which directly and indirectly has been the greatest force in building up the country, has cost Canada nothing.

The Canadian Pacific is in the widest and truest sense a national institution, in the success and progress of which every citizen has a direct interest.
